SYDNEY RAGGED SCHOOL

beyond the present life; they did not consider that they would live in another world. These schools were all opened with prayer and reading the Bible, and every lesson went on nicely and properly. There was a good foundation laid down for them, and upon it they would become good children. He hoped the people of Sydney would continue to look after the ragged children in this city. The report spoke of the number of children which many of these Ragged Schools had. What made him ask the question in these Ragged Schools was this: He hoped that on any occasion, and distribute the prize. What struck him most was that one boy who came to receive a prize, when he got back to his parents' house.

took off his coat for another boy to come up in, that cost came up three times on the backs of different boys. These schools were founded upon the principle that those who subscribed to them were helping who could not help themselves; they were trying to do what those who most wanted human help. They were like Moravians, who never sent a missionary where missionaries were sent by other Christian sects. It was so with the supporters of these schools; they went behind the people, and they went far beyond other institutions. The

give two guineas every year, what a large sum they w in Sydney, and train them for heaven. Taking all this consideration, they would see that this society was worthy of the support of the citizens of Sydney. He tru that at their next meeting there would be no more balanc blaming real work on the work. There was only one reason for further that he wished to make. He would urge upon it to remember what Christ had done, for them, and let them ask themselves what they had come to Him.

Mr JOHNS WENT said it was not because he could not speak as eloquently as and thereby arouse their enthusiasm or because he was a man of high social position, that he was there to record the adoption of the report; but his presence was because he had for a long time been a worker in the nection with these schools, and therefore was made to speak, not as a theorist, but as one who from his own rich life could testify to the good which had been accomplished, and of the need there was for continued increased exertion for the benefit of these children—for the improvement of their intellectual, their moral, and their religious nature. The report spoke, in the first place, of compulsory education; of the fact that it had been accomplished; of the Government's intention to visit the houses of some of the children with a view to ascertain that more regular attendance at their respective schools was being maintained.

and, as the Government was not prepared to do so, he was obliged to resign. He was then elected to the chair of whom Hargrave School were named. Therefore he was glad to hear that the Government had recognised the necessity for endeavouring to secure the attendance of such children at school. No doubt the parents might feel it a hardship to have to allow their children to leave home, and forsake home duties in order to attend these schools; but the importance of education was so great that the interests of the parents would have to be sacrificed in this way—the parents must exercise self-denial.

by allowing their children to attend school. There was time when at meetings of a similar nature to that it necessary to urge the importance of education, and to of the benefits arising from it; but now happily that had passed. Very few men indeed could be found in community who would not admit the advantages of educa-

was true and just, worth to the community what he himself was able to use for the benefit of others. So when he was able to do that, he became valuable to the community just in proportion to the amount of knowledge he acquired, and therefore it was necessary that the Government should compel those children to be educated. He was glad to find that that had been done, and that it was about to be carried out to a greater extent than it had already been done. Doubtless there would be some who would say "If you are going to compel their attendance at school, why not compel their attendance at a Public school—why not compel them there?" Some theorists might speak in that way, but the practical man knew that, although that might be well in theory, it was quite impracticable. Now, here I went to the Sunday evening school to see the children of their kind, and he could assure them that bad was the way He had seen such children in dirty old ragged and similar pair of trousers, and a sort of concern called a shirt. Those clothes were the best the children could turn out.

even or a Sunday. Now they have returned and sit them to associate with the children in the Public School. He would be glad to show them the Public School, but as masters were they could not do so. All that was to be done was they were to deal with them in the Ragged Schools. If, however, they should find amongst those attended the Ragged Schools, any girl or boy whose clothes was such as to enable them to attend the Public school he thought such children should be sent to the Public schools, so that they might be benefited by the influence and conduct of children, whose parents were in a better position.

in life than they were. But there was a large amount of money which the children attending the Ragged Schools who were it was thought impossible to send to the Public Schools, therefore, the money had to be provided to afford them education, therefore, it was thought it would be a wise plan for the Government to utilise the Ragged School, or rather to supplement the amount raised by public subscription for these schools with money granted by the Government in that way or rather to be wisely and well spent. In the first part of the report it was stated that "the committee feel assured that without it. They, however, were not the class who generally to the fore in the prosecution of such work as of the Ragged Schools, so that it was rather improbable that he would have an opportunity of witnessing such experiment. The persons who promoted the Ragged Schools were those who loved the Bible, and felt the value of immortal souls, were willing to sacrifice such thing in order to win those souls to Christ. The object of their education, especially in dealing with ragged children, should be to bring about a renewed heart and generated nature; and in order to effect this the Father sent a Saviour willing to renew, to regenerate, and to bring us into the way in which it was desired they should go. We had been the joy and pleasure of those working in the same school to see here one, and there another, coming out of the lives of the Christian life. He returned to several of those who had been under his tuition, and former ragged scholars who were known for their idleness and indifference to the kindly feelings which former ragged scholars found towards their former teacher. The lives of our portant that the Holy Scriptures should be taught, while very little would be gained without such instruction. Being impeded, he was not prepared to say that nothing could be taught without the Bible. Mr. Kent then attracted to the library as a valuable adjunct to rural schools, and appealed for contributions in old books or in money. One of the greatest advantages of bringing the children under the influence of Christian men and women was that they were to realize what Christian hearts and minds were. Children began to feel that Christianity was something which they had to do. They were induced to reflect the Bible, religion, and churches were not, as they at first thought, things peculiar to the better class, but were for them. These children eventually took their place in Christian congregations, feeling that they had an interest in such, and were entitled to do so. He trusted that this increased amount of public sympathy would be extended to the great and glorious work of ragged schools. (Appendix)

Rev. Mr. GARDNER supported the resolution. This was the first Sacred School meeting he had attended, and he expressed very much pleasure in being there. The work the teachers were engaged in was a very important one, and he was in full accord with what had been said of the necessity for religious education in connection with secular teaching in the educating of children. He thought the plan of these meetings might be altered with advantage, he would, he considered, be for the children to examine the Bible for an hour or two in the earlier part of the meeting, and then to have the sermon, after which they might sing.

The children were then examined by the Rev. J. L. Miller in simple Bible questions, and having sung a hymn were dismissed to the homes.

"The Rev. R. S. PATTERSON moved the second resolution—"That the success vouchsafed to the Battered Soldier's cause be a grateful acknowledgment to Almighty God, and should stimulate to increased exertions, and that the following gentlemen be the officers and committee for the ensuing year:—Treasurer, Mr. Edward R. Fairfax; secretary, J. S. Harrison; committee, the Lord Bishop of Sydney, the Very Rev. the Dean of Sydney, Rev. J. C. Barner, Rev. R. S. Patterson, Messrs. G. Barker, N. J. Crocker, M. Chaslin, J. M. G.

Joseph Paxton, R. G. Reading, and Joseph H. Wood. The report which had been read was a faithful statement of what had been accomplished, and was an evidence of success. These schools had produced good servants, good citizens, good wives and good husbands. The children were those who had been born amidst misery and vice, when it was seen that, in many instances, after they left the schools, they became respectable members of the community, there was evidence of both moral and civil success. We should be encouraged to go on, and still these schools which could not be done otherwise, and names in the list contained in the resolution were a guarantee of the importance of that work.

MR. R. G. READING, in a few words, seconded the resolution, which was then put to the meeting and passed.

The meeting closed with prayer.
